PREFACE.

THE present Dictionary of the Latin Language, forming part of the Classical Section of CHAMBERS'S EDUCATIONAL COURSE, is essentially a school dictionary; that is, it contains only words and phrases occurring in the best Latin authors whose works are most likely to be read in schools and colleges.

The work has been compiled by Dr KALTSCHMIDT, the well-known German lexicographer, from the best Latin dictionaries now in use in this country and on the continent, and has been carefully revised by myself. Learned discussions and disquisitions could not be introduced, as incompatible with the objects for which the Dictionary is intended, and also because they would have considerably increased the bulk of the volume. On the other hand, it has been thought advisable to give, as far as possible, the etymology of every word, not only by tracing it to its Latin or Greek root, but to roots or kindred forms of words occurring in the cognate languages of the great Indo-Germanic family. This feature, which distinguishes the present Dictionary from all others, cannot fail to awaken the learner to the interesting fact of the radical identity of many apparently heterogeneous languages, and prepare him at an early stage for the delightful and instructive study of comparative philology.

All proper names have been excluded, because the student may be reasonably supposed to derive information of a historical, geographical, and mythological nature from his Classical Dictionary, in which such subjects can be more fully and satisfactorily discussed. It has also been thought unnecessary to mention, under separate heads, such adverbs as are regularly formed from adjectives, as the learner ought to know the rules of their formation from his grammar. The adverbial form, however, is always mentioned under the adjective from which it is derived; and wherever an adverb presents any peculiarity either in its formation or meaning, it is given as a separate word.

L. SCHMITZ.
